The changes I've made to Fishy Business include: not having music in each minigame, not having customers that move, and not implementing better sushi rolls. For the music in each minigame, I thought it was too overstimulating and it suited just having the background music with sound effects for each button click. As for not implementing customers, I found the movement to be too difficult, such as the sprites moving through walls (even with barriers) and finding it hard for them to sit in chairs. I don't know if I should've made the restaurant bigger, but the sprites were moving awkwardly through the chairs/tables as well. Instead of better sushi rolls, I opted for staff upgrades to earn money faster. From this project, I learned how to use Unity and its features more and feel a lot more comfortable with messing around with it.
